More bravery is the theme for Cory this month. One illustration of this is the removal of his extra tooth “mesiodon”. X-rays revealed it had to come out or else it would cause problems for the permanent teeth. It was painful, tearful work to get those nova cane shots, but he stuck it out and had the tooth pulled. Above it the before and after picture.

The next area Cory has shown more bravery is with playing with neighborhood kids. He has gotten to the point where he actually enjoys going out and playing with the guys, and even considers some of them his friends. This is a huge answer to prayer. Cory has even said that he wants to try going to the public elementary school next year. This will take an even bigger dose of bravery but right now he thinks he can do it!

This is a picture of sleeping beauty one morning she slept in. She continues to be our sweet princess, ever cheerful, ever happy, except when the mean prince tortures her. She is pretty relaxed when it comes to playing with other kids and can often be found playing by herself whenever the neighborhood kids invade our house.

Billy is no doubt the clown of the family, as the youngest often is in many families. Some times has us all laughing loudly around the table with the funny things he says. Often he will recite or sing a hymn he has learned, except change the words or change the first letter in every word with resulting sentences that can turn out anywhere from silly to hilarious. In addition to his well-timed wisecracks we are often amazed at his vocabulary. He probably talks non-stop all day long, with lots of repetition, but every once in a while he will come out with an impressive word he picked up somewhere. He is also very specific about his feelings. If he is sent to his room for throwing a fit we often hear, “Mom, I feel disappointed,” or “Mom, I feel angry,” or “Mom, I feel upset” or something else specific but never the vague “I feel happy or sad.” However, he still refuses to get the hang of potty training and with his 3rd birthday coming up we wonder how long he will hold out.
